

Last week, top NOAA, Navy and Coast Guard officials not only admitted that climate change is happening much faster than anyone expected, they instantly tried to pivot to PROMOTING what a wonderful opportunity it will be. We are not kidding. You really need to see this clip.

<http://www.nbcnews.com/video/nightly-news/52502914>

"It will be like opening up a new subdivision for ecotourism," they enthuse. The only real problem they anticipate is getting the infrastructure in place to support all those new visitors to places that used to be the climate regulating ice caps on our planet. The biggest crisis they worry about is whether people will be able to access their Facebook up/down there.

This is beyond appalling. Yes, we suppose a lot of people will need new infrastructure, considering that their own former homes will be permanently underwater, wiped out by the new category 6 hurricanes, etc. Carbon dioxide in the atmosphere continues to skyrocket. Every day are news stories about unprecedented (except in antediluvian times) heat waves. Yet, Congress and the President do precisely nothing to change course.

We need to move IMMEDIATELY towards complete cessation of all fossil fuel burning with a Manhattan Project level acceleration of development of carbon neutral energy technologies. Or we can continue to fiddle while the planet continues to burn.